章节摘录

Vocal and instrumental music constituted a principal part of the funeral ceremonies of the Jews. The pomp and expense on these occasions were great. The invention of notation and musical characters marked a distinguished era in the progress of music. The character of the Grecian music appears to have been noisy in the extreme. The trumpet players at the Olympic Games used to express an excess of joy when they found their exertions had resulted in a great victory. The Romans were, from their first origin as a nation, possessed of a species of music which might be distinguished as their own. As soon as they began to open a communication with Greece, from that country, they borrowed also their music and musical instruments.
