章节摘录

Medicare and Medicaid costs for the elderly have similarly soared . They now account for more than 80 percent of all federal money spent on health care . (Statistical Abstracts , 1989d) . If the growth of Medicare were to continue at its present rate , by the year 2000 it would cost more than Social Security--another impossible figure , of course , but one that shows the collision course we are on . The growing proportion of the elderly in our population adds pressure to increase expenditures for Social Security , Medicare , and Medicaid . That the elderly make up a larger proportion of our population is due to two factors : improvements in sanitation and health care that allow people to live longer , and the effects of abortion and other forms of birth control are having on our population distribution . Consequently, between the years 1990 and 2000 , the population of people 65 and over is expected to grow by 3 , 300 , 000 , while our college-age population , 18 . to 24 . will shrink by 910 , 000 (Statistical Abstracts , 1989e) .
