章节摘录

In the food service business, beverage service is extremely profitable. Many establishments offer drinks as part of the complete meal service, but for many others drinks are the principal part of the business. There are different kinds of places that primarily serve alcoholic beverages: in the United States the most common is a bar ( called a pub, short for public house, in England ) with a long counter from which drinks are dispensed; a cocktail lounge usually has a bar, small tables, a relaxed atmosphere, and minimal entertainment; a tavern is an older term for a similar place which is usually in a residential or industrial neighborhood; night clubs offer the additional attractions of dance music, meals, and entertainment. In restaurants where alcoholic beverages are part of the meal service, they can be grouped into three categories: before-dinner, with-dinner, and after-dinner drinks. The most common before-dinner drink is the cocktail, a concoction of liquor ( such as gin, rye, and rum which are 80 to 100 proof ) and ingredients such as bitters, fruit juices, ice and fruit. Some before-dinner drinks are unmixed, such as vermouth and sherry: these are usually called aperitifs after the French term meaning to stimulate the appetite. Drinks served with the meal are usually wine and beer. The customer makes a choice from a winelist, a menu of wines offered by the restaurant, listing the types and vintages. Some restaurants that are particularly luxurious employ a wine steward or sommelier that has information about the wines, takes orders, and serves them.
