章节摘录

The ILO commissioned 26 political, labor and economic leaders to survey opinions in countries and prepare proposals to better address globalization issues. The results are outlined in the report, "A Fair Globalization: Creating Opportunities for All. " "The future of our countries, and the destiny of our globe, demand that we all rethink globalization," Mrs. Halonen and Mr. Mkapa said. The commission says the social dynamics of globalization often are disregarded by governments and institutions and that steps need to be taken to incorporate social issues into the public debate. But Bill Murray, spokesman for the International Monetary Fund, argued that social development has been considered by the IMF and in documents such as the United Nations Millennium Declaration, a broad mission statement issued by the world body to mark the new millennium. "Its been pretty clear in recent years that social development takes a prominent role," he said. The ILO report said there is a need for international organizations dealing with development to coordinate their policies. The separate agendas of the organizations sometimes undermine each other, it said. The authors said the United Nations is best equipped to handle that coordination. Globalization is occurring without proper governance to guide it, the report said. It recommends a globalization forum that would bring together the major actors, such as the IMF, the World Bank and the United Nations among others, to formulate policy initiatives. This forum also would produce "There is a rather great disjunct between the institutions created after a "State of Globalization" annual review. World War II and the needs for the future," said John Sewell, a senior scholar at the Woodrow Wilson International Mr. Sewell said political leaders hold the key to reaching a global consensus on social Center for Scholars. issues. "Those institutions are really the property of their members. Until the heads of government decide they want to do things, its hard for them to do it themselves. "
