章节摘录

Tourism is booming in China. But the supporting travel insurance industry isn't sharing the growth. As the number of travelers increases, so does the number of accidents. During this year's May Day Holiday, for example, 11 major accidents killed 19 people and injured 23. No national statistics (统计) are available on the popularity of travel insurance. According to a report, in Shanghai, only 20 percent of group tour travelers bought insurance coverage and spent an average of 6 yuan. The percentage is believed to be lower for independent travelers. The limited coverage by travel insurance is partly to blame for this low figure. Most travel insurance plans cover only injuries and medical expenses caused by accidents. Travel mishaps like lost luggage and cancelled trips are not covered. Travel insurance also doesn't cover activities like diving, skiing and parachuting (跳伞). These activities are more dangerous and need insurance more than everyday activities. Travel insurance is more widely used in western countries. For example, in the UK, more than 90 percent of holiday makers take out insurance. Travelers, aged 18 to 25, are the least likely to take out travel insurance. But two-thirds still buy it when they go abroad. Western travel insurance usually covers three types of accidents. The first is trip cancellation due to illness or injury. Insurance policies specially designed for students even include unexpected exams as a reason for trip cancellation. The second part is similar to travel insurance in China, covering medical and accident costs.
