章节摘录

In 1901 the citizens of Colorado Springs in the USA decided to collect everyday things and put them in a steel box. On the box it was written "To be opened after midnight, December 31st, AD 2000", and it was stored in the Colorado College Library. One hundred years later, on the very day, 300 people gathered to watch the opening of the box. Among them, many were the grandchildren of those who had placed things inside the box. When the box was opened after midnight, everything inside was in good condition. There were newspapers, photos, diaries, name cards, family trees, books and dozens of letters, including one written by Theodore Roosevelt, who became the President of the USA later that year. Many of the letters were addressed to their grandchildren. They talked about the hope that people of 1901 had for the people of the next century. At that time, there were only a few thousand people living in Colorado Springs. Now nearly half a million people live there. Colorado College Library has scanned all the things and put them on a website. Cecil Muller, whose grandfather had placed a lot of postcards in the box, said that the box would be a great gift to him. It could help him learn a lot about history. In April 2001, people filled the box with things from modern Colorado Springs and stored it for another hundred years. They called it "Time Capsule".
