章节摘录

Due to its huge size, it took a long time for the United States to share a common culture between each state. Until about 100 years ago, communication between states barely existed, and this lack of communication between Americans prevented them from knowing about the culture and interests of people in other states. Each state had different language usage, different clothing styles, and different social norms. Americans were finally able to expand their horizons with the production of automobiles and radio. The mass production of automobiles began in the late 1920s and unprecedented changes came along. Above all, the production and distribution of automobiles provided Americans with convenience of mobility and this led to a changing leisure culture. On holidays people were able to go on a trip to adjacent states for short periods and travel to areas far away from their homes. This change enabled Americans to experience the lifestyle and custom of those in other towns and states. This mobility changed the lifestyle of Americans and connected them to people of other states. As a result, the culture, clothing style, and social events were no longer confined to a single state. With the spread of automobiles, the number of radio listeners increased as well and people could share and enjoy the same music no matter how distant their states are. Furthermore, the events and news of one state became also areas of interest for other states. Whilst newspapers delivered news limited to a particular area, radio delivered news to all states across America and all Americans began to have simultaneous access to the same news, events, and stories. The development of radio paved the way for Americans to share news, events, and information, giving them a sense of unity.
