章节摘录

版权页：插图： Squirrels often communicate with whistles, chirps and chucks, which sound like the word "chuck". Whistles and chirps are like the sounds that many birds make. Now scientists have translated some of their squirrel-speak. Hare, a professor of zoology at the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg, and his team managed to record squirrels' alarm calls. The researchers studied the sounds and then played them back to 60 wild squirrels, which the scientists approached individually with a video recorder to capture their responses. Some squirrels lifted their heads up and became alert. Creatures that were more frightened simply ran for their lives and dived into caves. "In effect then, whistles that mix with chucks say there's an enemy of average threat that's here, and whistles without chucks say there's an enemy of seemingly average threat around here somewhere, while pure chirps say, I'm hiding here because there's an immediate danger." Hare told Animal Planet News. Hare and some other researchers believe such sounds are part of an advanced language that develops just as all other communication systems. Although squirrels risk their lives when they call out to warn others of threats, other squirrels might admire this behavior, thus increasing the caller's social status, like humans who look up to heroes. Hare added that other animals, such as birds, probably understand at least some squirrel language, since they also may benefit from the alarm calls. In fact, another Canadian study found that deep-voiced, black-capped chickadees have their own language too. According to certain research, there are a lot of tidings in chickadees' calls, such as directing fellows' activities, keeping in contact between mates, and raising alarms. While chickadees and other birds are often welcomed into gardens by homeowners, squirrels are frequently viewed as pests. Hare wishes greater understanding of the complex social lives and communication systems of squirrels will provide "hope that humans will gain a greater appreciation and stop doing harm to these animals".

1. The text mainly talks about ___. A. the study on the language of squirrels B. the comparison between squirrels and chickadees C. the calling for the protection of squirrels D. the ways for squirrels to escape from their enemies.

编辑推荐

《百题大过关:高考英语阅读与完形百题(修订版)(2014)》从体裁方面看, 高考阅读理解尽量追求体裁的多样化, 总的说来, 一般分为以下四种: 记叙文、说明文、应用文和议论文。

完形填空近些年来多采用一些夹叙夹议的文章。

在选材方面也非常注重与时代精神的结合, 特别是关于国外新科技、新发明的说明文, 一直是高考考查的热点。
