前言

In terms of cuisine, there is a considerable difference between Chi-na and the West. Chinese cuisine can be much more individualized and impulsive than Western cuisine. Although there are recipes to follow, cooks frequently adjust the seasonings and even ingredients they use, according to the preferences and wishes of their customers, which makes each dish creatively unique. Take the cold dish Flavored Cucumber as an example. The flavor of this simple, cold dish differs from place to place, depending on local tastes. People in Shanxi Province (in North China) like vinegar, so they will add more vinegar to the dish; people in Sichuan Province (in southern China) prefer spicy foods, so naturally they will prepare this dish with more chilies; people in Jiangsu Province (in eastern China) enjoy sweet foods, and therefore sugar will be the seasoning of choice for this dish. Though the style of cuisine may vary from place to place, the pursuit of taste remains the main aim of every region.
