章节摘录

插图：Kam Raw was the youngest of seven children, one girl and six boys. Two of his brothers were good singers and he considers his oldest brother to have been the best singer in the village. There were also some other very good singers in the village. In this environment Kam learned a large part of his repertoire simply by growing up, and in many cases he does not know when or from whom he learned particular songs. Apart from the stimulation in his home and at play with other children Kam sees certain other situations as particularly important in his learning process. One was the singing that occurred among young boys and unmarried young men when they lived together in the common-house of the village. Another situation for picking up songs was while walking in connection with journeys related to trading or seasonal work away from home. Above all he mentions the singing that was done in the fields especially during the months immediately before the harvesting season. At that time of year — roughly from August to September — young boys lived in the fields in order to watch over the growing rice and to guard it from birds and wild animals. The evenings and nights were spent in small field houses. This was a time when the youngest children learned singing and how to play certain musical instruments from their older friends. When Kam first stayed in a field he was about ten years of age. In the evening the boys of neighbouring fields used to gather in one of the field houses where the older boys would teach songs to the younger ones. Often enough this seems to have taken the form of proper lessons during which two, three or even more songs were taught. The one who knew a song well would sing it and the others tried to copy him. Mistakes would be corrected by the 'teacher' and during the following days the 'pupils' would practice and try to memorize the new songs. When necessary they would correct each other or the 'teacher' would do so if he happened to be about. At this time of year the boys also did some hunting and fishing. Songs were taught also on these occasions, particularly while walking along forest paths in small groups or two by two.
