章节摘录

What was your first reaction when you were assigned to give a speech in your class during your college days ?
How do you feel when you are called to give an impromptu speech to a group of teachers and managers whom you have never met before ?

Do you still remember your first response when you are given an invitation to give a lecture to a group of professional people whom you know little about ?

How about speaking in front of a camera ?

The first natural response of majority of people to those assignments or invitations is a facial expression of worry, scare or panic. Some will automatically murmur, "Oh my God, what I am going to do ?

" Others choose to decline the invitation plainly "Sorry, I cannot do that. " or "Please, ask others. I have other appointments on that day. "

When it is a must to present a topic to the public, speakers carry out a thorough search on the web pages, or books, hoping to find a ready-made speech which is related to the topic assigned to them. At the moments of delivery, many speakers find that their legs are shaking, hands are trembling, hearts are beating harder, breath is hard to grasp, lips are tight, and sweats are pouring all over the body. As they begin their presentation, speakers might not understand what they read in the written speech, but they keep reading. They might not see how many audiences there are, and all they need to know is to finish the speech.
