章节摘录

Gothic romantic fiction, a type of historical romantic fiction with gothic elements, is the main current of British romantic fiction in 1960s. This new tide originates from a famous British woman writer, Eleanor Hibbert (1906-1993). In 1960, having been inspired by the whole success of Mary Johnston's To Have and to Hold (1900) and Daphne du Maurier (1907 - 1989)'s Rebecca (1938), Eleanor Hibbert wrote Mistress of Mellyn (1960) by boldly blending gothic mystery and horror elements into historical romantic fiction. This book got instant sensation after being published under the pen name of Victoria Holt. The next year, it got republished in London and was also warmly welcomed. After that, she published six gothic romantic novels in succession, and accumulated sales accounted for 4,000,000 volumes. Then, British woman writers like Dorothy Eden (1912- 1982), Anya Seton (1904- 1990) and Mary Stewart (1916 -) all made their works successfully. Especially Mary Stewart, she was named as the queen of gothic romantic fiction. Her Nine Coaches Waiting (1958) and other ten books were always among the list of bestsellers, totally sold up to 10,000,000 volumes. At the same time, Daphne du Maurier continued to follow the road of Rebecca and published My Cousin Rache (1951) and other bestselling books. The birth and development of gothic romantic fiction is inseparable from the complicated social background. In 1960s, the popular images in English society were images of youth, liberation. A group of young rule-breakers like Hippie and Beatnik gradually filtered new ideas into people's mind, influencing people's values and beliefs. But there is, of course, the other side of the 1960s —— a post-war Britain, temporarily affluent, but had to cope with the loss of her position as a world power and underwent a process of decolonization which paid attention to the historical meaning of loss of Empire.
